this project can take a year or a decade. just a little whenever we feel like it. no rush right? if there is another program lmk, it's just that I have a chromebook and that is what is on here thought we could just follow the books and ask random people to write a chapter or make mail art and others could be totally deleted, censored, 'lost', or one or few words

looking good so far and yes, no rush, just as much as we want whenever we want

Dadaists, absurdists, surrealists had always believed that by striking an alternative aesthetic, by taking alternative pleasures, or by undermining the classical mode of representational painting, or establishing harmonic structures in music, by this you could change the face of society. What happened with the Beats was that by merging this transformation of standards and aesthetic pleasure with an actual attack on political structures you effect a sort of non-specific revolution, which was not programmed, which was not dictated and didn't have an alternative set of rules. You'd scrapped the old rules and now, hopefully, a new set of rules would evolve from a way of life that had been established according to human pleasure and generosity. It erupted, I would say, with Allen Ginsberg's "Howl."

[But there was] a shift between 1966 and 1967 from poetry and art and jazz and anti-nuclear politics to just sex and drugs, the arrival of capitalism. The market saw that these revolutionaries could be put in a safe pen and given their consumer goods. What we misjudged was the power and complexity of the media, which dismantled the whole thing. It bought it up. And this happened in '67, just as it seemed that we'd won.

— Jeff Nuttall (remarks in Days in the Life: Voices from the English Underground, 1961-71, edited by Jonathon Green) [quoted by Jan Herman in Nuttall Show Comes With a Warning, August 14, 2016]

Jed Birmingham, in Yay!: A Moving Times Supplement (An In-Depth Examination of My Own Mag)

Burroughs saw in Nuttall a kindred spirit, and more importantly, a kindred spirit with a literary outlet.

Possibly, Burroughs was also drawn to the fact that My Own Mag was a mimeo production. The idea of taking the means of production into one's own hands and out of the clutches of the established publishing industry went in line with Burroughs' feelings towards the mainstream media. Burroughs understood the power of the corporate press, represented by the Time-Life Empire, to manipulate word and images. In the essay "Ten Years and a Billion Dollars," Burroughs writes, "Journalism is closer to the magical origin of writing than most fiction. That is, at least a few operators in this area — people like the late Hearst and Henry Luce — certainly quite clearly and consciously saw journalism as a magical operation designed to bring about certain effect. And the technology is the technology of magic; in the case of newspapers and magazines, mostly black magic." Yet as Burroughs wrote in the Talking Asshole section of Naked Lunch, "there's always a space between, in popular songs and Grade-B movies, giving away the basic American rottenness." The mimeograph revolution served as a "space between" or "technology of magic" that could foster oppositional sentiment. In a letter to Nuttall reprinted in My Own Mag 9, Burroughs writes, "Well I hope pamphlet publication gets going have always yearned nostalgically for the old pamphlet days when writers fought in the streets." Alternative publishing dovetailed with Burroughs' ideas of smashing control.
